[DOC] DISCOUNTED CASH FLOW VALUATION

The amounts for the projected cash flows and the terminal value are discounted to. The DCF method of valuation involves projecting FCF over the horizon period, calculating the terminal value at the end of that period, and discounting the projected FCFs and terminal value using the discount rate to arrive at the NPV of the total expected cash flows of the business or asset. Learn how to use discounted cash flow (DCF) to value stocks. Discounted cash flows are used by stock market pros to figure out what an investment is worth. However, there still remains huge amount of subjectivity, even in inputs which are typically thought to be clear cut.

We have just discounted the cash flow of $30,000. It's only worth $15,000 to you at this moment. Intrinsic Value of a business is the present value of the cash flows the company is expected to pay its shareholders. The rest of the class is about the practice of valuation: defining and estimating expected cash flows for different types of...

Discounted cash flow method means that we can find firm value by discounting. The valuation technique we employ called discounted cash flow (DCF) valuation is the valuation technique universally favored by the finance profession. Value the company using an appropriate valuation technique such as DCF and divide the value arrived at by total number of outstanding shares. Business valuation is typically based on three major methods: the income approach, the asset approach and the market (comparable sales) approach. Discounted Cash Flow DCF illustrates the Time Value of Money idea that funds to be paid or received in the future are worth less today (Present Value PV). DCF is a approach to valuation, whereby projected future cashflows are "discounted" at an interest rate (also called "rate of return"), that reflects the perceived riskiness of the cashflows.
